

BRITAIN'S RED SHADOW OF TERROR

A BRITISH M.P. has put before the British Foreign Secretary and Home Secretary an amazing dossier telling of the activities of a Communist terror group which plots to murder, terrorise, and blackmail people living in the British Isles.

Lieutenant-Commander John Anthony Langford-Holt, Royal Navy, the member concerned, who is M.P. for the Shrewsbury Division of England, is an acknowledged security expert.

The dossier which has come into his hands is a series of mysterious deaths which seem to be suicides, but with certain alarming aspects pointing to them having been executions.

One of the chief items on the Lieut.-Commander's list concerns the disappearance of Father Henry Borynski, an outspoken Polish Roman Catholic priest in Bradford, Yorkshire.

COURAGEOUS

A courageous crusade against Communism. Father Borynski was one of the most dynamic figures among the scores of thousands of Poles who have taken refuge in England since the war.

The terror group is believed to have struck on a warm moonless night in mid-July last year.

Just how and where it remains to be known — does the whereabouts, no of the heroic chaplain.

Or the whereabouts of his body!

All that is known of the disappearance of Father Borynski is that he received two telephone calls shortly before he walked out of his home in Bradford, never to be seen again.

The calls worried him. He became morose, mu-tered to himself something that sounded like "so they want me now," and went out to disappear completely.

Backing up Commander Langford-Holt's dossier is a statement issued by ex-Supt. Fred Narborough, recently retired from Scotland Yard whose work at the Yard put him in close touch with Britain's Communist underground.

He declared "It is abunddantly clear on the evidence of the Maclean and Pontecorvo cases—(missing diplomats, who disappeared behind the Iron Curtain) and also, it seems in the mystery of Father Borynski, the missing Bradford priest—that their disappearances were organised by an underground secret agency.

"It works in this country and Western Europe, and is controlled from behind the Iron Curtain."

Commander Langford-Holt's dossier goes on to tell how, earlier last year, a railwayman trudging through the half-light at dawn found the headless body of a brilliant young scientist, William James Moore, beside the track near Beaconsfield in Buckinghamshire.

The head he found a little way off, the other side of the rails.

Nothing more than the usual paragraph headed "Suicide on Railway Line" might never have been printed in the British Press.

had it not been for certain glaringly unusual features.

First, there was hardly any blood where the body was found although Moore had been decapitated as surely as a French aristocrat by the knife of the guillotine.

Then, Moore's bicycle was found a mile from the line, and there was no trace to show how he got from this point to where his body was found.

But—most alarmingly—inquiries among friends and relatives showed that the young scientist (an electronics engineer of outstanding promise) had spoken of being threatened by a mysterious "they" who wanted him "to do something."

And in his youth, it was discovered, he had been a member of the British Communist Party.

Then in the case-book of British M.I.5 secret service chiefs, and on the records of Scotland Yard's Special Branch, the name of William James Moore, aged 27, scientist, of Downing-drive, Greenford Middlesex, was entered as "Suspected victim of Communist underground terror group."

Cover For Murder

That there is a terrorist group operating in the British Isles, chiefly among the 300,000 refugees from Eastern Europe who now live there, M.I.5 and the Special Branch have no doubt.

There have been too many "suspicious" suicides which could so easily have been staged to cover murder.

There have been too many complaints from terrified aliens, too much evidence of "interference" by officials from the Russian Embassy in London, for there to be any other conclusion.

The technique of the terror group follows a well-established pattern.

Using "relatives at home" as a blackmail weapon, they attack the morale of Eastern Europeans trying to settle peacefully in Britain.

Those who have gained positions of trust in British industry or research, they try to persuade by promise, or threat, to return to Russia.

Others whom they seek to corrupt with unadvised propaganda and promises are British nationals who it is to be seen, Communists in their irreparable youth — for the Communist Party never forgets.

If threats fail then death may strike suddenly, ruthlessly.

But for all its suddenness and ruthlessness, the death is cunningly and calculatedly contrived, so that it looks like accident—or suicide, at the worst.

The death of William Moore conformed clearly

The death of William Moore conformed clearly to the pattern.

As his brother Leonard told the Coroner at the inquest into his death, "He had become depressed and worried."

"Four or five weeks ago he mentioned that somebody had dictated a document to him and more or less made him sign it."

Thomas Moore, the father, declared, "He had told me he was engaged on secret and confidential work. He said that 'they' wanted him to do something. I do not know who he meant by 'they' and I cannot say what happened after he left the house."

Then the brother revealed that Moore had belonged to the British Communist Party when he was 18, but had thrown it up afterwards.

The verdict of Mr. Percy Nickson, the Coroner, was an "open" one.

This meant there was not sufficient evidence to show whether Moore had died by his own hand, by accident, or by someone else's hand.

Mr. Nickson was also coroner at the inquiry into the death of Karel Firt, the Czech refugee, whose body had been found hanging from a tree in a Buckinghamshire lane a few months before the death of young Moore.

On this occasion Mr. Nickson returned a verdict of "Suicide."

Fifty-one-year-old Karel

Firt had escaped from behind the Iron Curtain only the year before, to seek refuge in Britain.

the year before: to seek refuge in Britain.

Coroner Nickson was told that there were Communist agents in the hostel where Firt had gone to live after being granted asylum, and that Firt had complained they were "bothering him."

The man who told him this was Edward Harrison, manager of the hostel, who said, "Firt saw a man whom he accused of being a Communist agent he had once known in Prague. Firt was very anti-Communist and a man of strong principles."

The dossier the Special Branch has on such happenings as the death of Karel Firt is an alarming one.

For the thousands of honest, hard-working refugees from Communism who have sought peace and safety in Britain it must be a terrifying one.

The terror organisation, under direct orders from Russia, seeks to "persuade" Iron Curtain refugees that Communism is the only creed and that they should spy on Britain now that they are there.
